residential singular space living

The owners of this townhouse in Houston wanted their first home to be a modern space that was comfortable, pulled together, as well as functional; a place where coffee tables functioned as footrests and dining tables could be work desks. On a budget of $20,000, the result is a space of individually interesting, but complementary pieces that create a unified whole.

This sultry suite stemmed from the couple's desire to have a master suite that catered to her request for a quiet sanctuary and his need for a masculine getaway. Both are harmoniously combined within this 300-square-foot space.

This small condo was designed for a mature couple who wanted to give up the responsibilities of a large family home. The entire condo, which had not been touched since it was built in 1965, was gutted and redesigned to provide the setting for a more simple, more sophisticated way of life.

A Cuban-inspired resort, hacienda-style architecture, and a layering of modern influences were the goal of this Parade Home.
